Gutwein Votes for Property Tax Relief, HB 1001 Passes House

(STATEHOUSE) Jan. 24, 2008

— Hoosiers are a step closer to property tax relief after the Indiana House of Representatives last Thursday passed House Bill 1001 by a vote of 93-1. The bill now heads to the Indiana Senate.

The bill contains about $700 million in new property relief, along with $250 million in already scheduled relief for 2008 and about $300 million in relief in 2009. The immediate relief should cut most homestead property tax bills by about one-third.

It also removes school operating and transportation funding and child welfare funding from local property, shifting the responsibility to the state.

Several elements of the House Republicans' Standards for Success were eliminated or altered in the final bill, such as a state spending cap and a strong referendum process. The bill does not have a state spending cap, and voters would be allowed to vote only on school projects not directly related to classroom learning, such as athletic fields.

"The plan gives meaningful, immediate and permanent property tax relief as we go forward in the process," said Rep. Gutwein. "However, there are a few things I don't like. I strongly disagree with the removal of the referendum. This is an insult to Hoosier taxpayers. Citizens are capable and should have the right to vote on projects that could potentially affect their property taxes.

"Another measure of the bill I do not support is capping only local government spending. If we are going to cap spending for local governments, then the same rule should apply to state spending. Lastly, the bill also includes $336 million in spending."

Although the bill has been changed from its original form, it still contains several elements that House Republicans have fought for. It offers immediate property tax relief, includes caps on property taxation and includes at least some form of public referenda on public spending.

The pantry is open by appointment only on Thursday. Appointments may be made by calling the Methodist Church office at 574-653-2201 or the parsonage at 574-653-9052.

Profiles in Change

by Ed Feulner

The presidential campaigns have boiled down to one word: "change". Candidates from both parties insist they're agents of "change". Elect me, each says, and our government and our country will be better.

Maybe the winner will actually succeed. But it will be an uphill job. Bureaucracies are designed to withstand change. So it's not enough to talk about making changes. You have to deliver change, in a way that makes life better.

Consider the group America's Second Harvest. In the late 1960s, it opened the country's first food bank to distribute excess food (that would otherwise have been thrown away) to the needy. It set safety standards that allowed companies to donate without worrying they were turning food over to unprofessional charities. Today there are Second Harvest food banks across the country.

"America's Second Harvest now moves more than two billion pounds of donated food a year, feeding more than twenty-five million people," writes Leslie Crutchfield and Heather McLeod Grant in their new book, "Forces for Good." Today, "the group resembles a national grocery store chain more than a typical nonprofit."

The authors studied hundreds of nonprofit organizations, trying to determine why many fail and, more importantly, why others survive and grow. In the end, they decided to focus on 12 successful organizations, including the one I lead, The Heritage Foundation.

They found that working with business is a good strategy. "Big government is out, and marketbased capitalism is in," the authors wrote. "Leading social sector organizations are rising to the challenge, finding ways to address the world's problems by working with, and through, government and business to launch innovative solutions."

Consider another organization Crutchfield and McLeod Grant analyze: Teach for America. "It seeks to transform the entire educational system," they write. That's an audacious goal. Teach for America is succeeding by convincing graduates of our country's leading universities young people who have job offers from Wall Street firms and consulting companies – to instead spend two years teaching, usually in poor neighborhoods.

The organization "has changed how we think about teacher credentialing, make teaching in public schools 'cool,' and created a vanguard for education reform among America's future leaders," the authors write. Today, former Teach for America educators are "launching charter schools. running for elected office, managing education foundations working and school as principals."

Most important, Teach for America gets results in the classroom. A study in 2004 by Mathematica Policy Research found that corps members "produced higher test scores than the other teachers in their schools; not just other novice teachers or uncertified teachers, but also veterans and certified teachers."

Crutchfield and McLeod Grant also review what doesn't work: confrontation and violence. "None of the high-impact nonprofits that we studied use extremist tactics to achieve social change," they note. There's a lesson there for groups such as Greenpeace and Code Pink: You're shooting yourself in the foot.

These extremists would be more successful if they'd avoid standoffs and follow the model pioneered by the group Environmental Defense. It's created partnerships with big businesses such as McDonald's and Wal-Mart to reduce waste clean the environment. and work, Markets and Environmental Defense helped "create new markets to change corporate behavior," the authors write. Environmental Defense is now dedicated to "Finding the Ways that Work." Sound advice for any advocate.

The Heritage Foundation has devoted itself to the mission of reducing the size and scope of government. Much remains to be done, but we've already scored some big victories.

We're proud that Crutchfield and McLeod Grant consider us a force for good, and we hope that, as we keep fighting for our values, we'll also encourage others to do so. That's the best way to deliver the "change" our country needs.
